 SHORT STORY OF THE DAY. 0000000000 • 0000000000000

AN HOUR IN OCTOBER.

Hen. Mrs. Arthur Henniker, in the Sketch. On the lowest terrace, overlooking the park, a woman was standing leaning one elbow against the stone edge of the bal-ustrade, and wistfully regarding the autumnal foliage and the grass that was still gray after a heavy rain. The atmosphere was heavy with moisture, and the crimson and yellow leaves that lay round her feet shone wet under a pale sunlight. Across the sky the birds flew in a long line towards the red woods, and she could hear the cry of the waterfowl on the lake that was hidden by the treebelt to the west. The woman's face was full of happy expectation. It was no longer very young or fresh, but it was full of charm and tenderness. Under her hat the glossy waves of her hair were scarcely touched with a gray thread. Her eyes were earnest and trustful in expression, and they seemed full of light as she looked now down at the sodded stretch of turf in the park, now upward toward the towers of the house. On one side of her a Michaelmas daisy, nipped by the frost, still showed some faint patches of lilac among the green and a few steps further down the terrace the chrysanthemums were still very bright in their orange, red and brown dresses, in spite of the rain that had only ceased to in their orange, red and brown dresses, in spite of the rain that had only ceased to beat upon them a quarter of an hour ago.

As the moments passed it was more upon the house-built like a French chateau, with its pointed turrets-and less upon the half-bright, half-chill October landscape, that the woman's eyes rested. A sense of yoy was thrilling her, though she looked calm and grave. During all the last week she had been too much absorbed in her own thoughts to enter with any zest into the diversions of the house party, and, even had she been less preoccupled, there was often a certain aloofness in her manner that kept people at a distance. Mrs. Chesney was conscious that, in taste and education, she belonged to a different epoch to that of the lively guests round her. They were absolutely modern, and she had very little in common with them. She could not play bridge, and she knew nothing of racing or of the latest developments in the serious or trifling love affairs that seemed of such vivid interest to these others, so small to her. Since her husband's death she had lived quietly and almost alone in a country house, gardening, studying, working for the poor. When at last she made up her mind to accept the invitation of a cousin of her husband's, the effort had been painful and depressing. She had grown shyer and more silent in those years of quietude. Even in her newfashioned clothes she somehow looked of a different world than that of Miss Vincent and Lady Norledge, who were the beauties of the party.

"My dear, she is essentially early Victorian? was the verdict of the lively Lady Norledge, as she discussed Mrs. Chesney with a friend. But now, on this October afternoon, standing alone in the fleeting sunshine and among the falling leaves. Mrs. Chesney with a friend. "What a dear old house, and what a picturesque place?" said General Trebovir, learning on the stone ledge as he stood beside her and looked over the park. "One is reconciled to autumn in such surroundings as these."

He turned toward her, speaking pleasently and frankly.

"You are very little changed" said. "You are very little changed," said he.
"It is so nice to find people after eight-
